James K. Parkington, who loves his wife devotedly, believes that she has fallen in love with Edgar Lynde Swetson, an exponent of neo-symbolism, a soul philosopher. To secure the happiness of Lida, his wife, he feigns suicide on board the steamship. He had left a will giving all his property to his wife, but when news of his death arrives, the only will that can be found is that bequeathing his estate to his aunt, Maria Fortescue. Swetson learns that Maria has inherited the estate and turns his attentions to her. Parkington tries seclusion in the mountains but wishing to know the result of his scheme visits his old home. His dog Pal recognizes him and follows him to a boarding house where he lives under the name of Spinks. Lida advertises for Pal and Parkington's landlady sends for her. Parkington hears the landlady and Lida discussing Maria's inheritance and that night he steals into his home to restore the right will. He hides in the closet and is discovered by Lida. In the meantime Maria and Swetson arrive and Parkington confronts them and orders them out of the house. Swetson reveals that he and Maria have been married. Parkington and Lida are reconciled. End.
